UNIFORM TITLE: USA Patriot Act of 2001

Mukerjee, Madhusree;

Scientific American v. 288 no6 (June 2003) p. 24, 26 ISSN: 0036-8733

LANGUAGE: English RECORD STATUS: Corrected or revised record

ABSTRACT: Science is losing out as the U.S. tightens its visa regulations. The Patriot Act of 2001 resulted in the implementation of an electronic system for tracking foreign students, and visa applications for scientists, engineers, and students in technical fields are now being comprehensively reviewed. As a result, foreign students are being met with denials when they apply for visas, partly because consular officials can be held personally responsible if they grant a visa to someone who goes on to commit a terrorist act. However, several estimates have attributed half the growth in the U.S. economy since World War II to innovation in science and technology, with foreigners playing an important role. Therefore, a major, permanent reduction in the amount of visas for scientists and engineers could result in a long-term downturn in the economy.

The Terrorist Threat Integration Center is a huge data bank that will merge domestic and foreign intelligence on U.S. citizens and foreign visitors. The U.S. State Department's database of 50 million visa applications has also been made available to U.S. police departments. The mayor of London England has begun a traffic control program that records the license plates of all cars entering the city center and provides the information to intelligence agencies. Citizens in both countries are getting used to increasing surveillance. Among many 'watcher' technologies briefly described are nanny cams, infrared surveillance, traffic cameras, auto transponders, cell phones, Internet and e-mail monitoring , keystroke logging, locator wristbands, smart cards, and supermarket discount cards. One of the world's largest databases, the BaBar database , is on the edge of Stanford University. It and is linked to a 3-KM-long particle accelerator, which stores records of millions of elementary-particle interactions that take place in the accelerator. BaBar engineers have developed techniques for containing data flow that are likely to be used by the huge surveillance archives of the future. Among topics covered are preprocessing and distributed computing as examples of the way in which database structures can lead to instruments that control their use; and the dangers of repurposing of surveillance information.
